The Nation, a leading Liberal weekly, for example, touches the matter in the briefest and most cautious manner, betraying fears of the Protestant Nonconformists, on whose approval the supare doubtless numbers of enlightened Nonconformists who would willingly see the offensive words of the declaration eliminated, but it is safe to say they are considerably outnumbered by their narrow minded brethren.

The moderate Liberal Speciator appeals to the Government to show courage and sincerity and remove the words which humiliate Catholics. It says: nation is and must remain Protestant, and it is right there should be potent statutory safeguards in this respect. but for the Government to indorse the view that those safeguards cannot be maintained without language of insult

KING MIGHT ACT HIMSELF

The Tory Saturday Review also strongly condemns the declaration. The matter is being discussed by the press in its every aspect. Among other suggestions there is one that if the Government cannot or will not relieve the King of the odious necessity of repeating the declaration in King Edward's funeral the as its stands he himself might omit the offensive words when repeating the declaration and trust to Parliament to indemnify him subsequently.

One of the strictest provisions of the English law requires candidates to furnish an account of all the expenses incurred during elections, the legal limit of expenditure being fixed according to the size of the constituency. Contravention of this provision was one of the causes of Capt. Guest being unseated for East Dorset. He declared that his expenses were $8,715, while his opponents proved that he spent at least an additional $13,170.

One item to which importance was attached was Mr. Guest's use of eight automobiles, lent by his brother-in-law, Mr Phipps, who, being unwilling that his agent, a circumstance which made it essary to figure this expense in the candidate's account.
